What's new in Oldowan:

Oldowan lithic technology is a type of flintknapping, the simplest use of flint to produce an industrial lithic tool like a stone point, blade or scraper. The Oldowan technique was developed at least 2.5 million years ago (mya) in the south-central African site of Koobi Fora. Oldowan were closely followed by Acheulean stone tool technology, and then, the advent of the Levallois technique at the end of the Middle Paleolithic around 400,000 years ago. The earliest known specimen of Oldowan, Gona site, dated to 1.66±0.16 mya, has a thin, retouched, stemmed point. The current archaeological evidence suggests the oldest technology was developed in an open and savannah type of ecosystem. Specimens found earlier were dated to as recent as 0.8 mya. Many have attributed the simple differences in tool shape and size as caused by behavioural adaptation to the rainforest. Examples of behavioural variations include producing more points and ranging farther away from sources of raw materials. Various studies have also looked into more rapid or slimmer points. Psychophysical analysis has also played a role in determining age by comparing it with the trends of people's anatomical features. Discovery In 1938, T. Edward Bowyer-Smyth, who was a member of the International African Institute, studied a fossilised piece of bone found in Tugen Hills, Mpanda District, Tanganyika Territory (now, Tanzania). After continuing his excavations in the site, he reached the conclusion that the Lower Oldowan toolkit has an age of 2.4 mya. Professor Alan B. Stringer who was the lead archaeologist during that time continues to work at the site, which is currently run by the Tanzanian Department of Antiquities. Uniformitarianism Theories positing a uniformitarian view of the Oldowan site, claim that Paleolithic technologies advance through slow, but consistent, cumulative and steady change. Based on the lithic technologies of Gona Cave and Koobi Fora, the evolution of Oldowan stone tool technology through time. The evolution of stone tool technology can be traced back to a single cross-cutting technique. This is also used in the development of other early technologies like the Levallois, at the end of the late Pleistocene. The development of other Early Stone Age technologies relied on the systematic use of cross cutting and percussion techniques. After the initial emergence

Why Claudio Gets & fails Oldowan:

A: When loading a page with PHP the server needs to know how to interpret the PHP code. If you start loading PHP before any of the html page is loaded all of the PHP will be interpreted before the page is assembled. To fix this, add the.php extension to the top of each page. I believe this is happening because, while the HTML headers are installed, none of the javascript headers have been installed yet (and so the body cant be parsed until after html is loaded). Also, please note that if you are planning on putting this on a web server you want to pay attention to settings in your php.ini file. For some reason, allowing these kinds of file extensions to run php is sometimes a pain in the butt to undo, and should be set to "off". Refer to your php.ini file for information about how that is done. The PHP code in this answer is from converting the code used in the answer mentioned in the comments in question. 1.
